Memories do not exist solely on their own; they are persistently entwined with the physical places where they occurred. In my paintings, fragments of landscape and abstracted architecture stand in for everything I have lived through in those places. My art depicts multiple locations simultaneously to convey the impact and accumulation of identity-shaping experiences.

Created through an intuitive process of layering and revision, each acrylic painting unfolds gradually. Traces of previous layers, as well as shifts in perspective and scale, give the work a sense of ambiguity and complexity. The process mirrors the idea of the work- negotiating layers and deciding what to hold close, change, or push away.

Linnie Brown is a painter who lives and works in Lehi, Utah. Her work, over the last twenty years, has centered on abstraction, complex layers, and the merging of disparate objects or time periods. Brown's paintings, in more recent years, seek to convey specific and personal subject matter, with fragments of landscape and architecture from her own life. Her densely layered acrylic paintings reference accumulated memories and the process of navigating one's identity. In addition to her studio work, Brown teaches part-time at Utah Valley University.
